Copyright Rights for Authors

Student authors retain copyright for all content created by them and submitted to the AULA Library Research Award. However, authors grant to The AULA Library the right to make available such content, in any format, in perpetuity. Authors may reproduce, in other contexts, content to which they possess the copyright, although in any subsequent publications the AULA Library Research Award should be acknowledged as the original publisher.

Authors have a choice of:

1. Dedicating the article to the public domain. This allows anyone to make any use of the article at any time, including commercial use. A good way to do this is to use the Creative Commons Public Domain Dedication Web form; see <http://creativecommons.org/license/publicdomain-2?lang=en>.
2. Retaining some rights while allowing some use. For example, authors may decide to disallow commercial use without permission. Authors may also decide whether to allow users to make modifications (e.g. translations, adaptations) without permission. A good way to make these choices is to use a Creative Commons license. Go to <http://creativecommons.org/license/>. Choose and select license. Choose "generic" if you are in the U.S. and "text" for First Monday articles. Background information about Creative Commons licenses can be found at <http://creativecommons.org/about/licenses/>.

3. Retaining full rights, including translation and reproduction rights. Authors may use the statement:
© Author 201 All Rights Reserved.
4. Authors may also choose to use their own wording to reserve copyright. If you choose to retain full copyright, please add your copyright statement to the end of the article.
